

Bill Taylor

vice president, Taylor Shellfish Farms, Shelton, WA

Photo by Keith Lazelle

The Wild Olympics are our common ground.

Hood Canal is home to the two largest hatcheries that supply seed to the West Coast shellfish industry—which directly supports more than 150 local jobs and many more in related industries such as processing, sales and shipping. By protecting Olympic Peninsula forest and river watersheds, we ensure clean and safe water so that shellfish companies can continue to grow and benefit the economy and ecology of Washington state. These watersheds are also natural filters for drinking water and vital to a healthy Hood Canal and Puget Sound. We must do all we can to protect the peninsula forest and river watersheds to guarantee our inland waters stay clear and sparkling. Today folks in the Wild Olympics Campaign are coming together to find the best way to do just that—to find common ground to protect our wild forests and rivers for the clean water and salmon we need.

Join the conversation. www.WildOlympics.org/CommonGround

- Olympic Park Associates
- Olympic Forest Coalition
- Olympic Peninsula Audubon Society
- North Olympic Group — Sierra Club
- Washington Wilderness Coalition
- The Mountaineers
- Campaign for America's Wilderness, Pew Environment Group
- Sierra Club
- American Rivers
- American Whitewater

